Concerning the Earth's orbit around the sun, the time of apsis is most relevantly expressed in terms of a time relative to the vernal equinox not in days, but as an acute angle of orbital displacement.

Not many uncial typefaces adhere to the historical form. The most famous of the uncial typefaces (and rightly so) is American Uncial, designed in the 1950's by Victor Hammer. Uncials, by their very nature, take up a lot of horizontal room, or set width. But uncials reciprocate by requiring very little ascender and descender space. This results in the uncial's remarkable and beautiful quality in text setting where each line has integrity with lots of white surrounding. A good, not overly-decorative uncial has a richness and elegance few other forms can match.

A true uncial is a majuscule form, lacking ascenders and descenders entirely. But faces such as American Uncial and Rieven Uncial—faces that aim to be useful and not merely ornamental—find a way to use the true uncial as an inspiration but to retain a lowercase in order to regain the flexibility we have come to expect in general text work.

In the case of Rieven, I wanted an uncial that was not at all decorative and therefore extremely versatile. The key to the design is that it is in many ways a roman, not an uncial. The slight back bowing of the rounded parts such as 'n', 'm', and 'h', the single story 'a' and 'g', the lowered cross bars of 'f' and 'e', all pay tribute to the uncial. Otherwise, the face is close to roman in construction. Also, there is not an extreme attenuation in the thins. By retaining a robust branching structure, the typeface can go quite small and still remain perfectly legible. If a sans serif and an uncial got together and had a type-baby, it would be Rieven Uncial.

Uncials are not found in italic form. Still, in order for Rieven to be a truly versatile face, it seemed imperative that it should be accompanied by an italic. Rieven Italic is able to work perfectly well with its uncial cousin in spite of the fact that it is structurally quite distinct from it. The trick is to make the contrast with the uncial be one of narrow to wide rather than straight to slanted.

Soufflé au chocolat

Soufflé au chocolat

Rieven italic slants only 5 degrees. The form owes much to the historical italic roots in the letra antigua cursiva of the 15th century humanist masters. To make it relate to the uncial form, I gave it ‘knuckles’ which suggest the branching direction of the uncial while, in fact, it actually branches from the bottom like a cursive. The names of the types: Rieven Uncial and Rieven Italic reflect the fact that they are really two different forms carefully brought together into a single, versatile family. —Steven Skaggs

Steven Skaggs studied calligraphy and typography under Hermann Zapf. His calligraphic artworks are in the collections of the Klingspor Museum, in Offenbach, Germany, the Sackner Archive of Visual and Concrete Poetry in Miami, and the Akademie der Künste, Berlin. He has been active giving workshops and teaching throughout the United States as well as Canada, Italy, Switzerland and Germany. Steven Skaggs lives in Louisville, Kentucky where he is Professor of Design at the Hite Art Institute, University of Louisville.
